CURIOUS TALK

There was some curious talk in the debate by the Iowa State Senator on the Lewis bill for a national convention to decide upon plans for electing United States senators by the direct vote of the people. Senator Dunham opposing the bill said it was inspired by the interests that are desirous of securing the seats now held by Senators Dolliver and Allison of Iowa. He added that it was a miserable political impulse which which prompted the introduction of this resolution. It sprung from the dirtiest, lowest, penny politics in the history of the state.

Talk of this kind from a friend of Senator Allison and Dolliver is curious because it will generally be construed as an admission that neither Dolliver nor Allison could hold the senatorship if the people of Iowa had a chance to vote on the question. No other inference is possible. And if the resolution was inspired by men who are unfriendly to the senators then they must believe strongly in their ability to oust them by a popular vote. Further, if the people of Iowa do not want to be represented by Allison and Dolliver they should be given the privilege of saying so.

From any viewpoint direct election of United States senators is altogether desirable. A large majority of the legislatures of the various states have already adopted resolutions of an affirmative character on the subject. The house has several times passed a resolution for a constitutional amendment, but the senate has invariably killed it. It may be that at some future time the senate also will act favorably, for the demand is great and growing constantly.

There is really no sound argument against the proposition. The public officer who is afraid to let the people he serves vote for or against him does not deserve to serve any people. The adoption of a constitutional amendment for the popular election of senators might deprive the august upper house of some of its best known members but the country could work along very nicely under the shock. It is even possible to believe that public business would go forward in a much more satisfactory manner than at present.

Germany didn't want a trade war with the United States, after all. She found we could get along without her much better than she could get along without us.
